The Green Movement Makes its Way into REIT Market

As happens with most major movements, nearly all industry sectors are adopting the latest trend, in this case, “going green,” and Real Estate Investment Trusts are not shying away from hopping on this energy efficient bandwagon. For the past couple of years now, industrial REITs have been developing more eco-sensitive buildings and projects. Although initially a bit of a risk, as it was unclear how “sticky” the green movement would be, it doesn’t seem to be fading anytime soon, as can be seen through recent progress of the hybrid car movement, making this a worthwhile investment, after all.

These environmentally friendly buildings are not just appealing to investors who also happen to be members of the EPA, however. They are also cost effective for both landlords and tenants and can reduce operating costs but nearly 10 percent. Even better: they can improve returns on investment by almost 7 percent. AMB, which recently merged with ProLogis, and DLR are just a couple of REITs on the forefront of green focused investments. DLR in particular is doing quite well in this new field.

However, there is a difference between Green conscious REITs and Clean Technology REITs, which have not been doing so well in the public sector. Clean Tech REITs focus on properties that create renewable energy, rather than the green focused ones that invest in high performance buildings, such as those certified by LEED and Energy Star.

As there is no real consensus at the state level regarding renewable energy technologies, I would be tentative about Clean Tech REITs for a while, until more can be determined about their long-term returns, and put more focus on environmentally friendly high performance buildings in the industrial sector.
